V. Conclusion:
Home: What pleasant thoughts are connected with the simple little word. It constituted the circle within which we turn for comfort and solace after our daily labors or weary wanderings. It is the place we will in later years enjoy looking back upon as the pride of our childhood days. It calls to our minds the fond memories of old associations and will always be the dearest spot on earth. Be it ever so humble.

A few years ago Jennie Lind, the renowned songstress who was singing before a audience in New York did not touch the very hearts of the people until she began to song for the "Home, Sweet Home." The audience gave heart to these feelings at once and thousands were seen with tears gushing from their eyes.

Some one has said, first to religious the deepest and most ineradicable sentiment in the human soul is that of the home affection. There can not be any real happiness in life or in misery without the home and this home is what we make it. If the parents are kind and always ready to give their good advice, nurture and instruct always ready to share each other's joys and sorrows, then the home will be a place of peace and happiness.

It surely will be pleasing to the parents if this child is started on the right road to rise for himself, friends, success or, last of all, eternal life. He will be the pride of his parents and a joy to his friends.
It is a sad thing to think of so many young people who have had no influence in the right direction: they have been left to the world while young, to enjoy themselves regardless of the life to come or the duties of this earth. In order to make the home a blessing the parents must take the matter into their hands: they must set a good example by being industrious and conscientious in all the affairs of life.

Then again the home must be made attractive and the may be done by making the rooms neat and cozy: by giving the toys, toys and games, materials for painting as was Benjamin's meet, or the hatchet as was George Washington. But while these may be good and may lead them to more thorough perfection and higher attainments of life, yet with these there is needed something to keep children off the streets of evenings during their leisure moments and that is by providing them with such reading material and encourage them to employ their time in any way that will keep them from idleness and make them more energetic.

Every young person has a leisure hour each day which might be spent in whatever way he may choose and if properly improved can be made not beneficial through the mental training he receives at in any of our daily life. By reading such books as will develop the brain and sharpen the intellect he will know more of the world around him and be able to appreciate the comforts of life.
Hence we see the great necessity of literature in to broaden our views of the world and in to help and comfort all through life. This may be illustrated by the fact that those who live in an out of the way place and have not the means to travel, would be almost entirely ignorant of the world if it was not for the circulations of literature which at the present time can be had in any home. Here it not for literature our curiosity would be greatly excited at seeing a book as was our Primitive the first time he rode on a train of care.

By reading we are enabled to become better acquainted with the manners and customs of the people and become more thorough in our chosen occupation. Mr. Milton says, to those who have been long shut up in cities no rural object can be presented which will not delight or refresh some of his senses. Yet some people will object in saying, that the literature is only a distinctive agent and liable to much time from their labor and family, but how many of these same people will spend their evenings on the street although we cannot all be a Thomas a Milton our efforts can be directed toward the advancement of our education and our help can be given to the advancement of literature by the earnest attempts directed toward it.

We have seen that there is a necessity for literature now let inquire into its powers or uses which will help to prove the necessity of literature.

By the powers of literature we do not intend to improve IV.

Upon any mind that the Locke merely of principles and sentiment of the human heart are the essential qualities of human life, but rather the kind that give character, expression, and connect the body and soul with eternal life. Romance belongs to the early ages and novels to the more advanced periods of history.

In the first place the power of literature is to produce better thinkers. Charles Lamb says, when I am walking and not thinking, I can read anything I call a book. He also thinks we cannot get along without dictionaries. Pocket notes, verses of Giotto, Kinkel, etc.

The Americans are a thinking people, and this talent has been brought about largely by our extensive reading and studying. He who can read a book without thinking what he would like to do, would have done how the author could write such an interesting and instructive work and express his opinions of the work.

By this thinking power we are enabled to get at the core of the subject and understand it more fully. This is proven in the study of mathematics, which requires all brain work and nothing can be accomplished unless the principle is well understood and then the work is nearly complete.

Literary power also cultivates taste whether it is natural or acquired. Mrs. Addison defines taste as being, that faculty of the soul which discerns the beauties of the author.
with pleasure and imperfections with dislikes. The word is usually thought of as referring to matters of dress or household duties, but it can also be spoken of in the literary sense.

The literature as in dress the tactics differ, some having a special liking for the lighter literature while others prefer the more solid. It might be well to define the natural and acquired tactics and note this difference. The natural taste is original with me and may be called one of our talents, while the required is that which has to be continually practiced and added to before it can compare with the natural.

The person who has a natural taste for art can accomplish the end much more quickly than the one who must study to make himself proficient in that line, when perhaps he would make a better painter. This may illustrate the story of a man who was anxious to go into the ministry and had a dream in which he saw the letters G. D. very distinctly and supposed of course that he was called to G. D. preaching but his labors were all in vain, no speaking of his unsuccessful labors and his dream was told the misunderstanding the letters G. D. for they meant G. D. slow.

So it is in many cases that the taste must be acquired if the taste is toward anything fine and beautiful the result will be beautiful. The writings of our earliest writers, as Chaucer, Spenser and Shakespeare were written from their own talents and talents, but since this time, literature has been mostly acquired by reading the works of some author and writing a story in nearly the same style.

Knowing that there is a great necessity for literature, we will turn our attention to the study of the advantages for Pleasure and Information.

First let us consider the information we derive from our reading, as this is of greater importance. The fact of reading to know all about the occupations we follow is quite evident for times, money, labor, and sometimes lives can be saved by fully understanding the understanding in life. The physician who had not read and become well acquainted with his occupation may kill more persons than he saves, as it is from the humblest occupation to the highest in life—indeed, one in each occupation so definite good can be attained.

By our reading we always receive some information which is an aid in the advancement of education. How much happier the people would be at the present time if in the earlier days more attention had been given to sound education.

There is untold pleasure in the study of Literature. Pleasure can be obtained in times of sorrow or contentment, sickness or health.
It is said science cannot be called literature but a great deal of pleasure can be derived from science. Scientists spend hours in reading some books of science which pertain to their chosen labor, but very few people can read the books with real pleasure.

Literature has charms for old and young, great and small. A good book in order to get enjoyment from it should be read daily just as much as the plant which needs attention every day. The mood in which we find ourselves depends greatly on the book we choose to read. If we are sad we need something to cheer us and if happy a more solid book may be read with pleasure. Some people take Paradise Lost for an after dinner reading. But who can sit down and read Hawthorne's "Roth in Bloom," Little Women or George Eliot's "Mill on the Floss" without deriving some pleasure from reading and also have a warm feeling towards the writer. Good prose are nearly as rare as good writers and without good reading we can not find real pleasure that should be obtained from the reading of books.

Lastly attention must be given to the solid and light literature. These are to be distinguished by their inward appearance.

Solid literature includes all books need for general information such as History, Essay, and Biography. Emergent cases, History is the working of the mind and its genuine exercise by the entire race of day. Without the history of nations we who are living at the present times would know nothing of Greece, Rome, or any of the nations now would the students be compelled to study them.

Some of the most noted historians were Ammon, Gibbon, Bancroft, Barrow and many others. A few of the latter historians are those of the writer in the Columbian Exposition which give an account of the proceedings of the Fair and a description of the buildings of Chicago, all of which are beautifully illustrated.

The lighter literature is mostly fiction and satire. It is an excellent literature and comes to us to cheer the world's heart. The idea of a great many people have is lighter literature as being an evil agent in life, some of our best writers were novelists but it is true that trashy novels are published which should not be allowed to enter the home.

The literature for children is quite as essential as are the playthings which every child have for this amusement. Since one has beautifully said literature is the atmosphere of the mind, in it we live, move and have our being intellectually. There is nothing children enjoy as much as Fairy stories and stories of adventure, which may be given very nicely in connection with a lesson in Geography, Botany and Biography of our great discoveries and Statesmanship may be given in this study of history. How much more interesting and instructive will the reading of the Village Blacksmith be to a child who has learned that the poet looks back several generations to find one of his ancestors in the Village Smithy "working beneath the spreading chestnut tree."

Certainly children are as clever and more thorough and absorb what they do read. For their minds are free from care and quiet of a settled home. Books which interest children are always approved by older persons as well.

In conclusion let me say I think the proper kind of literature for the home is that pure and sound for in the line of reading material the evil that comes from the trashy literature is avoided. Whatever we read or fail to read there is one book that should be our daily companion. It is the Bible. All other literature is read and laid aside for occasional reference but this is a book we will carry with us all through life. It is the only book Stanley carried with him through the dark continent and it has been compared to a lamp that shines, a sword that cuts, and a star that guides.
A good and pure literature both in and out of the home is one of the highest developments of the ages, and among its many advantages it will tend toward saving young people from idleness and vice, saving them to true manliness and womanliness and lifting them into realms of beauty and truth.
